

Request for Permission to Use Financial Times Articles for Non-Commercial Linguistic Corpus Analysis

1 message

Dear Sir or Madam,

I am writing to request clarification and, if possible, permission regarding the academic use of Financial Times articles for my Master's thesis.

I am currently an MA student in linguistics at the University of Raparin, Kurdistan Region of Iraq. My research involves corpus-based analysis of English economic news writing. Specifically, my study focuses on the linguistic analysis of English articles—namely definite articles (the), indefinite articles (a/an), and zero articles (Ø)—as they occur in economic journalism. The analysis is purely linguistic and quantitative, examining grammatical patterns and frequencies rather than news content, viewpoints, or reporting.

For the purpose of building a balanced academic corpus, I plan to collect and analyze one Financial Times economic news article per day over a period of approximately three months. Each article would be examined only for article usage (definite, indefinite, and zero article forms). The texts would be stored securely for analysis and would not be circulated or shared.

I would like to emphasize that:

- All articles would be accessed lawfully.
- The texts would be used solely for private academic research.
- The material would not be shared, redistributed, republished, or made publicly available.
- No full articles would be reproduced in the thesis; only brief illustrative examples or aggregated statistical results would be included where necessary, with full and proper citation.
- The research is entirely non-commercial and conducted solely to fulfill degree requirements.

The Financial Times represents a highly respected and authoritative example of professional economic journalism, and its inclusion would significantly enhance the academic quality and representativeness of my corpus.

I would be grateful if you could confirm whether this limited, non-commercial linguistic analysis is permitted under your usage policies, or whether formal written permission is required.

Thank you very much for your time and consideration. I would be happy to provide any further information if needed.

Yours faithfully,

Nabaz Muhammad Saeed

MA Student in Linguistics

University of Raparin